BORROWED CLUNY.

on the window ledge in the shabby living room. It was nice of Ella and she wanted to make as good an impression on Harvey's sister (whom she had never met) as possible. But Adeline had a curious inrooted aversion to borrowing. It was not a matter of pride. Pride with Ella would be nonsensical. The two had grown up in adjoining weedy yards, in almost adjoining shabby cottages. Their fathers worked at the same wholesale grocery house, their mothers had borrowed yeast and loaned jelly recipes ever since either slim, pretty girl could remember. Nevertheless, Adeline hesi-

Ever since she had known Harvey Dale, the new editor of the daily newspaper of the small city, she had been dubious concerning the opinion his people would have of her and her people. It had been love at first sight with both her and Harvey when they met at a church af-fair. He had just come to town and his people lived in another state. But she soon learned that they were far above her socially and financially. Not from Harvey had she learned it, but from the other people who knew of them. Jack Frost Arrives.

The Moon looked down on the Green Forest and the little pond of Paddy the Beaver in the very heart of it, and the Moon smiled, for it was plain to see that Paddy the Beaver was happy. Yes, sir he was happy. There was no doubt about it. For the time being he had forgotten all about his worries regarding Farmer Brown's boy. He couldn't have told you just how, but somehow he knew that Jack Frost would arrive that very night and Paddy was preparing for him. You see it was this way: To make that spien did house of his out in his pond as stout and safe and good as he wanted it to be Paddy needed the help of Jack Frost and so he had been waiting and watching stone. So he worked and worked as hard as ever he could and patted and smoothed the mud down on the walls and roof of his house and hoped that Jack Frost would come early enough to do his work so well that jolly, round, red Mr. Sun would not be able to undo it with his warm rays the next morning. The little stars looked down and twin-kled as they watched Paddy work, and they were very, very bright.
